HIS PINTO

He sat on the manger, his head bowed in grief,
no word of comfort could give him relief.

For the one loved so fondly had crossed the divide and could never return to her young master's side.

Just one tortured thought could enter his head and that was that Honey, His pinto, was dead.

She was born on the prairie midst cactus and sage while the killdeer and swallow flew over in rage.

Her skin was so soft so clean and so white with wild honey patches a huggin' her tight.

He was so happy, so happy that sunny June morn
when cute little Honey, his pinto was born.

Don't grieve so my son, tho your pinto has flown
on the wings of Pegasus to her heavenly home.

For you'll be corralin' Old Dusty again and time will soften your hurt and your pain.

You'll again ride the range where your pony has fed.
Your tears'll dry up, you'll be happy again,
Even tho, Honey, your pinto is dead.
